Portfolio Review

The much-anticipated January effect propelled Taiwan's stock market, as the TAIEX gained 8.2% in NT dollar terms in January. Strong liquidity was apparent during the month as average daily market turnover increased 96% from December's level. Foreign investors returned, and recorded net buying of, NT$95.8 billion in January, an increase from NT$19.4 billion in December. Investors focused particular attention on domestic consumption stocks on the back of a strengthening NT dollar, which appreciated 1.8% over the US dollar during January. Related sectors including construction, retailing, transportation, and tourism each rose more than 15% during the month. The focus was also on mid- and small-size companies and their leveraged growth prospects in 2004. The only sector that posted negative returns in January was the plastics sector, which experienced a downward correction after a strong rally in December 2003.

In US dollar terms, the Fund returned 9.90% in January, which was slightly below the TAIEX's return of 10.18%. While our sector-balanced strategy helped us benefit from the strong market, our holdings in the plastics and transportation sectors underperformed their respective sectors, which negatively affected the Fund's performance. Conversely, our holdings in the technology sector, such as IC packaging and handset related companies, positively affected the performance of the Fund.

While we expect a volatile market as the March presidential election approaches in March, our positive view of the market has not changed. We continue to favor the cyclical growth area and we will look to accumulate related stocks on any weakness during the coming month.
